Message from the Guest Editor

Dear Colleagues,

Parkinson's disease is a neurodegenerative disorder characterized by motor symptoms such as tremors, rigidity, and bradykinesia. Understanding the complex processes involved in the development and progression of Parkinson's disease is crucial for advancing our knowledge and developing targeted therapeutic strategies.

This Special Issue, "Pathophysiological Mechanisms of Parkinson's Disease", will publish original research in basic science and translational research that can contribute to a better understanding of pathophysiological mechanisms underlying Parkinson's disease. This Special Issue is multidisciplinary and aims to promote progress in the etiology, genetics, molecular correlates, pathogenesis, pharmacology, psychophysiology, cognitive dysfunctions, and neuroimaging correlates of Parkinson's disease.
