Message from the Guest Editors

In response to the burst of the societal demand for craft food and drinking products, research in food sciences, more specifically in food microbiology, is particularly focusing on microbial biodiversity in food. The challenge is immense. It is necessary to assure the consumer of the authenticity of a product, marked by its territoriality and developed with the least chemical inputs, while ensuring product safety and maintenance of its healthy and organoleptic qualities. This Special Issue encourages authors to submit original research articles or reviews addressing food or beverage microbiota, innovative uses of microorganisms in food or beverage processes (matrix protection, product elaboration, etc.), and the implementation of microorganisms for the development of new products or processes.
