Message from the Guest Editor

Dear Colleagues,

Pulmonary medicine is a continuously evolving field with the utmost relevance in children, as the greatest changes in the anatomy and function of airways and lungs occur during the first years of life. There remains much to be learned about normal development and physiology as well as the consequences of diseases—infectious and not—and surgery for this particular category of patients. We will consider articles on asthma, bronchopulmonary dysplasia, cystic fibrosis, recurrent and persistent pneumonias, infections, aerodigestive disorders, congenital lung malformations, neuromuscular disorders leading to chronic lung problems, interstitial lung disease, apnea, and sleep-related breathing problems. Articles based on clinical and translational research are also welcome in this Special Issue, as well as papers on new technologies.
