Message from the Guest Editor

Head and neck cancer is a major public health problem worldwide, as it is the sixth most common cancer worldwide and has low survival rates, even in recent decades.

In a clinical context, many tools and methods have been developed to increase the accuracy in order to identify the most suspicious areas for malignancy, to define correct margins of lesions or simply to help in the screening and follow-up of patients, including optical analysis systems, cytological methods, vital stainings, or the use of biomarkers in tissues or even saliva.

In view of this, we invite authors to submit research or review articles to be published in this Special Issue that describe the most recent evaluations regarding diagnostic and screening tools or methods with potential use in the diagnosis or prognosis of head and neck cancers, also including potential malignant disorders.
