Message from the Guest Editors

Dear Colleagues,

In the wake of persistent global push against climate change and other environmental related challenges confronting human existence in the 21st century, diverse policy drive are being recommended toward attaining a sustainable environment.

Considering the complexity of the subject of environmental sustainability, this discourse remains an evolving subject because of the inter-connectednes of the environmental aspects with all human aspects. Thus, it suffice to suggest that ‘Science of the Total Environment’ is a necessary pathway to understanding environmental sustainability. More importantly, the ‘inclusivity of Science of the Total Environment’ becomes a necessary and sufficient pathway to unearth age-long environmental challenges.

In essence, this special issue is geared toward inviting scientific contributions from authors on the subject that addresses the importance of inclusivity in attaining a desirable state of the total environment. An expected manuscript should address but tot limited to the sub-areas of health, waste management, land, pollutant emission, carbon capture and sequensation, energy, human behaviour, and innovation.
