Message from the Guest Editor

Sustainability has individual, organizational and society wide implications for the ecology as a whole; however, it is ultimately human behavior which will sustain or destroy the capacity of the ecology to support life. The challenge is that while industrialization has allowed humans to thrive by the same token, it has created a significant negative impact on the functioning of the ecology. Human interaction with the ecology, however, is regulated by law, from soft law such as international public law and industry-led codes to hard law passed by governments. Accordingly, the claim is made that law is able to lead to sustainable social practices.

This special issue invites submissions that investigate efforts by businesses, citizens groups and law reformers/practitioners to improve the sustainability performance of business organisations. Submissions may range from investigations of peasant-farmers' norms, to national and even global social and environmental programs such as those focused on implementing United Nations norms. Methods of all disciplines are welcomed including, in particular, institutionalism and law.
