Message from the Guest Editors

Dear Colleagues,

The conservation and management of endangered animals is a considerable challenge, and extensive research is required to enable us to understand their evolution and adaptation to their environments. This Special Issue of Animals, entitled “Conservation and Evolution Biology of Endangered Animals”, focuses on the biology, ecology, and evolutionary processes of endangered animals, and aims to shed light on their conservation and evolution.

We encourage authors to submit original research articles that address critical topics associated with the conservation and evolution biology of endangered animals. Topics may include the behavior, reproduction, evolutionary adaptations, genetic diversity, population dynamics, conservation genetics, and conservation strategies of endangered species. This Special Issue could provide a platform for researchers, conservationists, and policymakers to share their findings, insights, and perspectives on the conservation and evolution biology of endangered animals.
