Message from the Guest Editors

Dear Colleagues,

Due to the ongoing aquaculture expansion, there is a necessity for sustainable and healthy food production with limited environmental impact. We are glad to announce that we are opening a new Special Issue to provide international, peer-reviewed articles for the research community engaged in different aspects of the aquaculture sector. Studies should be focused on aquatic organisms of commercial interest or endangered aquatic species as well as aquatic experimental models, considering their whole life cycle. For that reason, this Special Issue will focus on: (i) advances in reproduction; (ii) the production of alternative ingredients for aquafeeds and innovative/sustainable dietary formulations; (iii) possible sources of contaminants along the supply chain including micro and nanoplastics, heavy metals, and others in both farmed and wild aquatic species of commercial interest; (iv) innovative and eco-friendly farming systems such as multitrophic aquaculture and aquaponics; and (v) treatment/purification technology of aquaculture wastes (including water) and waste revalorization. Research and/or review articles are welcomed.
