Message from the Guest Editor

Dear Colleagues,

In order to promote innovation in the field of dentistry, it is necessary to develop not only conventional dental materials but also an emergent dentistry by incorporating advanced science and technology. In addition to biomaterials, the development of bioengineering technologies including proteins, cells, and genetic manipulation and their application to medicine are currently attracting significant attention. The development of new materials and technologies and their development into treatment methods is expected to lead to new breakthroughs and innovations in future dental practice. In this Special Issue, we invite various papers on the application of bioengineering to dentistry.
