Message from the Guest Editor

Dear Colleagues,

3D bioprinting is an innovative technology in the biomedical field. The technology is believed to enable the creation of cell-laden constructs with a complex structure, like native tissues and organs. A key issue which is necessary for a further progress of the technology is a development of bioinks suitable for their intended applications. Here, we recruit manuscripts focused on the development and application of bioinks containing original and modified natural compounds helpful for creating functional tissues.
