Message from the Guest Editors

The aim of the present Special Issue is to deepen our knowledge in the field of colorectal cancer associated with chronic inflammation. It is known that chronic inflammation is involved in the development of colorectal cancer through different pathways compared to sporadic colorectal cancer. Moreover, inflammation-related colorectal cancer appears to be associated to a younger age at diagnosis and to a worse outcome. The scope of the present Special Issue is, therefore, to increase the knowledge about inflammation-associated cancers, from its precursors to patient outcomes.
