Message from the Guest Editor

Rehabilitation treatments are at a turning point thanks to the emergence of new disruptive technologies and the integration of advances in neuroscience. This is especially relevant in specialties such as physiotherapy, and even more so in pediatric physiotherapy.

As a result of these changes, this Special Issue is promoted with the aim of updating the scientific knowledge available on rehabilitation and physiotherapy treatments during childhood for specific problems of this vital stage or to address health problems that can occur at any age but in which, for their treatment during childhood, certain particularities of this stage must be taken into account.

For all of the above, this Special Issue is open to the publication of scientific articles such as systematic reviews with meta-analyses and experimental research.
