Message from the Guest Editor

Over the years, public health agencies and healthcare providers have worked tirelessly to improve neonatal outcomes. Although these communities have made great strides in combating newborn morbidity and mortality, substantial room for continued improvement remains. The identification of modifiable social, behavioral, and health risk factors that affect birth outcomes and contribute to neonatal mortality is indeed paramount. Resource allocation to assist with these changes is also of great importance, particularly in underserved populations. In addition, neonatal medical and surgical breakthroughs are key to both diminishing death rates and improving quality of life.

This Special Issue of Children will feature recent advancements in neonatal care. We invite manuscripts focused on all aspects of newborn management, including reviews and original manuscripts.
