Message from the Guest Editors

Despite impressive advancements in cancer screening, prevention, and treatment technologies, widespread disparities in access to quality cancer care prevail. As low- and middle-income countries undergo an epidemiological transition that intensifies the burden of non-communicable disease, it is imperative that the disparities and inequities in global cancer care are acknowledged and addressed. Global oncology provides an opportunity for all nations to think critically about how cancer care can become more accessible, affordable, and equitable. Therefore, employing strategies of bidirectional learning and respectful collaboration can facilitate improved cancer care delivery on a global scale.

This Special Issue will explore key global oncology topics, including value-based care, implementation science, health technology assessments, and considerations when delivering care in resource-constrained settings, among others. The Special Issue will feature a diverse range of authors with expertise in cancer research, education, policy, and clinical care. The issue will present successes, challenges, and ways forward in the field of global oncology.
