We aim to reflect contemporary research trends in the design of collaborative learning practices in the digital era by emphasising the issue of working towards democratic and inclusive digital solutions of collaborative learning environments.

Possible topics may include learners' understanding of collaborative learning practices; implementation studies on digital collaborative learning practices; innovations through working together; digital tools to create learning environments that encourage collaborative creativity; challenges of implementing collaborative digital learning environments; conditions for learning together in digital practices; and digital infrastructures and tools for collaborative learning practices.

Submissions on any other topics within the scope of this Special Issue are also welcomed and will be fully considered. The areas of application can include different disciplines and practices where the overall topic of learning together in collaborative practices is involved.
