Message from the Guest Editor

This international Special Issue aims to provide a compilation of current research that takes up questions related to teaching quality, teaching effectiveness, and teacher assessment. These key themes are organized by questions such as:

- What are the theoretical perspectives that guide teaching quality and teaching effectiveness research and practice?
- What aspects of teaching are attended to when determining teaching quality and teacher effectiveness?
- What methods of assessments are used to determine teaching quality and teacher effectiveness and what are their impacts?
- What are the supports and barriers to creating reliable and valid schemes for determining teaching quality and teaching effectiveness?

Original research articles and reviews are welcome. Research areas may include (but are not limited to) the following: theoretical arguments or critical reviews for what counts as teaching quality or effectiveness; reviews of particular methods of teacher assessment; critiques of teaching quality or teaching effectiveness schemes; data-centred studies of local, regional, or national teacher assessment processes.
