Dear Colleague,

Globalization, technological advances, and teaching methods have made foreign language education more complex. The diverse backgrounds and specific needs of learners further complicate this evolving field. This Special Issue aims to cover various aspects of teaching and learning in foreign language settings. Topics for this Special Issue can cover a variety of areas. For example, they might study how students interact with a foreign language in different environments or how different testing methods affect learning outcomes. Studies could also explore how new technologies such as artificial intelligence or virtual reality can aid language learning. We are also interested in research that explores innovative teaching methods, examines psychological factors affecting learning and teaching, and investigates the cultural and policy-related aspects of foreign language education. Studies that focus on accessibility and inclusivity, employ approaches from different academic fields, or offer detailed case studies are particularly welcome.
