Message from the Guest Editors

The recent evolution and reconfiguration of the global energy paradigm has imposed new approaches in understanding the relation between traditional energy production and renewables.

This Special Issue aims to address critical challenge and research in sustainable and renewable energy systems attempts in view of progressing energy production, trade, transportation, communication, and other spheres of the energy global value chains. We welcome submissions from all areas related to energy production and effects in the economy as a whole, with a high degree of novelty as full-length articles, reviews, and conceptual papers. Both theoretical and practical contributions that focus on the topics related to the economic effects of renewables and just transition across developing countries are encouraged.
