Message from the Guest Editors

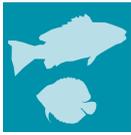

Fish are the largest and most diverse group of vertebrates. This diversity is reflected in many biological traits, including behaviour. Understanding fish behaviour may have implications for the way we build dams, ecotourism, aquaculture, fisheries, and other economic and industrial activities. This Special Issue has a broad scope, and intends to capture the diversity of fish behaviour, from its fundamental aspects and underlying mechanisms to the applications of its study. Contributions covering environmental challenges with implications for fish behaviour, such as climate change, ocean acidification, or pollution, are also welcome.
