Sexual satisfaction has been conceptualized as the perceived contentment and satisfaction with sex life within an intimate relationship or as sexual activity alone, as well as the absence of sexual distress. Sexual satisfaction and sexual pleasure are important to sexual health and are considered by the World Sexual Health Association to be a sexual right that should be promoted and improved among individuals and couples. We are pleased to invite you to contribute scientifically and theoretically to the field of human sexuality, particularly to the field of sexual satisfaction and sexual pleasure. Research areas may include (but not limited to) : Scoping reviews, systematic reviews and meta-analyses on sexual satisfaction and sexual pleasure

Longitudinal and cross-sectional studies on sexual satisfaction and sexual pleasure, and psychological and/or physiological correlates

Cross-cultural studies and/or the influence of cultural and social dimensions on sexual satisfaction and sexual pleasure

Intervention projects (and outcomes) on promoting sexual satisfaction and sexual pleasure in individuals and/or couples.
