Message from the Guest Editor

Pharmacy practice has traditionally been known to be synonymous with the dispensing function. However, as pharmacy profession continues to evolve and the scope of pharmacy practice expands, pharmacists have taken on several roles—providing a spectrum of prevention and treatment services to enhance population health outcomes beyond the dispensing of medications. The ease of accessibility of pharmacists to the public enables them to effectively contribute to public health efforts. This Special Issue aims to highlight the ways in which pharmacists are participating as public health practitioners—through research, case reports, commentaries, etc.
