Message from the Guest Editors

Cancer cells, as well as peritumoral and inflammatory ones, engage in well-orchestrated interplays to form an inflammatory tumor-driven microenvironment, often associated with drug resistance during treatment. The crosstalk between inflammatory biomarkers and the intrinsic properties of tumor cells have been identified as a pivotal regulator of tumor initiation and progression.

This Special Issue will include some of the current and interesting advances on molecular and biochemical markers/targets in different tissues and will include gene expression, protein, and biochemical pathways, such as key regulators in inflammation and cancer signaling.
