Nowadays, it is difficult to find a naturalist without a particular love for one, or several, beloved, special molecule(s). For me, this role is filled by benzene in all its grandeur and beauty, encompassing molecular crystals, aromatic hydrocarbons, fullerenes, carbon nanotubes, graphene molecules, and amorphous carbon. The benzene family continues to amaze and delight in many ways, with new special molecules or varieties continually emerging. The current Special Issue invites, first of all, scientists for whom the benzene family holds particular significance. The Editorial Board of IJMS also invites any papers or review articles detailing the latest achievements with regard to their special molecules. The physics and chemistry of real molecules, related breakthroughs in modern technologies, virtual models, and new ideas are all welcome topics.
