Dear Colleagues,

Road infrastructure is a crucial component in the economic growth of every country, which requires holistic and well-developed planning from the perspective of various disciplines. An efficient road should address the requirements of various road users and be forgiving to its users. A road has different components, and many engineering disciplines are involved in the planning and design of a road system, from geometry, pavement, and structure to traffic and hydraulics. This Special Issue aims to gather works from practitioners involved in road infrastructure design, management, and construction.
