Message from the Guest Editors

Dear Colleagues,

In this 2nd-year of the Special Issue we continue to collect contemporary papers with topics including, but not limited to, interactions between waves and ocean structures. The wave theory can include effects from ocean structures. Various ocean structures can be included, such as fixed, movable, porous, flexible, free-floating, or with moorings. We are particularly interested in coupling between waves and structures emphasizing effects on wave fields or motions of the structure. As for the research methodology, it can be analytical, numerical, or in situ data analysis. New findings are especially welcome. With the increasing development of natural energy such as solar, current, or wave energy, new types of ocean structures interacting with ocean waves could also be interesting topics. We encourage you to continue contributing to this Special Issue, and helping this Issue successful.
