Message from the Guest Editors

Emergency medicine is a discipline that encounters an extensive range of conditions, patients, and settings, which are not always suitable for the characterization of patients. The development of precision tools in order to deal with characterization is one of the most valuable areas of research in emergency medicine.

The aim of this Special Issue is to collect cutting-edge research concerning risk scores, biomarkers, predictive models, and tools that, through the concept of personalization, aid health care professionals characterizing patients.

We welcome authors to submit original articles or reviews on emergency medicine.
