Message from the Guest Editors

This Special Issue concerning Latin America and the Caribbean focuses on the relationship between global and local risks and the regional economy and finance.

In this regard, we welcome original papers on topics such as the changing geopolitical and geoeconomic framework and regional risks; natural resource management in a riskier world; new economic, social, and political vulnerabilities based on international production and trade patterns; global and regional value chain management opportunities, risks and strategies; regional and local financial markets, institutions, and uncertainty; the opportunities, challenges, and risks of cutting-edge technologies for the region; the political economy of regional economic and financial risks; the economic and social challenges of natural disasters; climate change, biosphere, and the regional economic development; the economics and finance of the energy transition and the bioeconomy; public policy and risk management capacity building; economic and financial risk management in unstable political and security environments; and the role of non-governmental and international institutions in risk assessment, management, and governance.
