Message from the Guest Editors

Dear Colleagues,

Research shows that entrepreneurship is a major driver of economic growth in developed countries. To succeed in new ventures, entrepreneurs require resources and support from a diverse array of external audiences. Such resources could greatly enhance the likelihood of the survival of a new venture. Consequently, this Special Issue aims to examine advancements in research on entrepreneurship and entrepreneurial finance. In particular, the issue aims to publish useful and interesting theories and evidence on mechanisms and consequences of entrepreneurship and entrepreneurial finance. We welcome both theoretical and empirical research in the field. Research could examine the process of entrepreneurship and decision making. Other interesting areas include decision making by angels and venture capital firms and the consequences of such, as well as innovative research on crowdfunding.
