Message from the Guest Editor

Since the global financial crisis of 2008, the markets for credit instruments have witnessed a burgeoning growth. Corporate and municipal bond markets account for the preponderance of non-sovereign finance not only in the major U.S. and European markets but also in emerging Asian markets. Mortgage-related instruments have been the central banks' instruments of choice to implement unconventional quantitative easing. Innovative credit instruments have been created to shore up banks' capital a world over. At the same time, a host of regulations such as Dodd-Franks in the U.S. or Basel III globally, have changed the landscape of credit risk management. Nevertheless, the unrelenting advent of credit instruments makes the big picture that much more complicated.

In this Special Issue, we aim to understand how the interplays amongst credit risk packaging and trading, financial innovations, and regulatory changes have shaped the landscape of credit risk management and pricing.
