Natural products are gaining even more importance regarding their replacement of drugs in human and veterinary clinical practice. Many in vitro and in vivo studies have demonstrated the ability of natural products to also act as nutraceuticals, i.e., to “feed” and “heal” simultaneously. Besides these features, natural products meet consumers’ demands for safe, healthy, and sustainable foods for pets and livestock animals, and they are able to reduce bacterial contamination and spread.

On the other hand, natural products require the quantity to be administered to be fine-tuned to reduce their potential adverse effects and prevent the possible onset of resistance phenomena. The aim of this Special Issue is to amalgamate recent evidence about new potential applications of natural products in animal practice, insights into their unexplored adverse/toxic effects, and first resistance phenomena. Reviews will be considered as long as they mainly focus on the aforementioned aspects.
