Message from the Guest Editors

New trends in operations management and supply chain management are constantly arising. Considering that services and products are produced through a series of interrelated business activities, it is expected that the value of each activity in a process can be aggregated with the value of preceding activities. This Special issue aims to provide a space for discussing the emerging challenges and opportunities of creating value in operations management and supply chain management. Research areas may include (but not limited to) the following:

- Operations management and supply chain management from a circular economy perspective
- Digital transformation and sustainable management in organisations
- Project management: processes, people and technologies
- Sustainable operations management
- Agricultural and extractive supply chains
- Risk management and resilience in organisations and supply chains
- Service operations management
- Strategy and operations management
