Message from the Guest Editors

New biomaterials are now playing a very important role in the development of modern dental medicine. The development and testing of dental biomaterials requires high-quality multidisciplinary research.

This Special Issue intends to offer comprehensive knowledge on biomaterials which have a main role in the engineering of functional dental tissue replacements, and will also provide studies on the application of the novel biomaterials in dentistry.

For this Special Issue, we expect to receive papers related to the new topics in dental medicine correlated with dental biomaterials like the color stability of dental materials, in vitro studies about composites and cements, CAD/CAM systems, laser applications, and some biomechanical studies about oral implants.

The Editors hope that the present Special Issue will attract many interesting papers about the recent advances in dental biomaterials.
