Message from the Guest Editors

Cardiac Magnetic Resonance (CMR) plays a unique and evolving role in clinical practice. It can reliably provide useful data for diagnosing and evaluating congenital heart disease, myocardial perfusion, myocardial/pericardial tissue characterization, and valvular heart disease with conventional and novel sequences.

We are delighted to introduce a new Special Issue focusing solely on Cardiovascular Magnetic Resonance. In this issue, we will consider articles across a wide spectrum of related areas, ranging from technical studies, study protocols, review articles, meta-analyses, research articles (including observation and randomized), and case reports. These could be in any area of CMR, including basic science, physics, and clinical work.
