Message from the Guest Editor

Hospitals or healthcare institutions are at risk of being overburdened, physicians are at risk of a burnout and emergency departments are clogged up. As such, these are hot topics in the area of emergency medicine; yet, together with several systems to counteract the overbooking of emergency rooms in order to improve hospital discharge (e.g., telemedicine, improvements for access to care for primary care and specialty services), a professional update remains the best resource for physicians and, in particular, the ability to manage diagnostic suspects for rare diseases with the chance of an early diagnosis and treatment.

We invite colleagues around the world to report their clinical experience with case series or case reports in emergency medicine and/or emergency rooms for this Special Issue in order to provide support for this fundamental area of the daily life of hospital workers.

Clinical contributions regarding acute illnesses, such as infections, thrombosis, bleeding, inflammation, autoimmune diseases, trauma and any type of emergency diagnostic rare procedure, are welcome for this collection.
