Message from the Guest Editors

The medical field is a specific work environment that is characterized by its own culture, in the center of which is the patient—the main beneficiary of medical services. In society, medical professionals are expected to ensure the health and well-being of the population. This means that have an important responsibility and makes society particularly sensitive to various activities in the medical field. For the medical system to properly function, high-quality medical care must be provided, which implies, on the one hand, a high degree of professionalism from those working in this field, and on the other hand, the establishment of a functional doctor–patient relationship based on trust. Medical activity in accordance with the standards of good clinical practice, in the context of a good relationship between professionals and patients, creates an environment in which patient safety is ensured, with this being the desideratum of medical systems worldwide. For this Special Issue, we expect the submission of research articles, reviews, systematic reviews and meta-analyses that address the ethical, legal and social challenges of the work culture in the medical field.
