Message from the Guest Editor

Dear Colleagues,

Given your distinguished expertise, I warmly invite you to submit articles, short communications, or letters for this Special Issue.

Inflammation is a physiological response triggered by various factors, such as pathogens or injuries. Chronic inflammation often creates an environment conducive to oxidative stress. Natural product extracts stand out for their chemical diversity and therapeutic potential. Furthermore, natural products targeting key pharmacological pathways offer significant therapeutic promise. The application of advanced screening techniques and OMIC technologies have enabled the identification of new natural compounds with significant antioxidant and anti-inflammatory properties. These technologies provide a deeper understanding of how these compounds interact with biological systems and how they can be used for therapeutic applications.

This field represents unexplored potential and is a rich source of opportunities for researchers interested in discovering and developing new therapies based on natural products. We invite you to contribute your research to this promising area of science.
