This Special Issue is focused on recent progress and novel trends in the science of polymer materials and nanomaterials with possible bioapplications. Special attention is devoted to polymers with advanced functions and unique properties applicable in both material research and biology-related disciplines.

The aim of this Special Issue “Advanced Polymer Materials and Nanomaterials: Bioapplications and Beyond” is to highlight the most recent discoveries and progress in all fields of science dealing with polymers with possible bioapplications. The biggest focus is placed on material characterization, stimuli-responsive materials, self-healing materials, tissue engineering, antimicrobial activity, cell culture, drug delivery, biomaging, bioactivity, but also beyond. Researchers working in this field and related disciplines are encouraged to publish their recent findings in this Special Issue of Polymers.
