Message from the Guest Editors

Dear Colleagues,

Polymers and their composites have recently received significant applications in energy, electronics, healthcare, and manufacturing technologies. However, the constant development of new polymer materials is essential to support and expand the growing interest in those advanced applications. Polymer chemistry and processing is one of the active, fast-growing, and multidisciplinary research areas in the United Kingdom. Academic scientists, funding agencies, and industries in the UK have demonstrated a strong commitment to promoting the scientific and technological advancements of polymer materials through conducting world-class research and providing financial supports for research and developments.

This Special Issue aims to highlight and promote recent advances in polymer science and technology in the UK through publishing original research and review papers. Topics of particular interest include, but are not limited to:

- Polymer synthesis and characterizations
- Polymer processing
- Biopolymers/biomaterials
- Functional polymeric devices
- Modeling and simulations of polymers and processes
