Message from the Guest Editors

We are literally surrounded by polymers in every aspect of our life, often without even realizing it. In France, a flurry of research is conducted by scientists and engineers active in both academia and industry in all sort of polymer materials, such as in electricity, electronics, information, biotechnology, medicine, dentistry, automotive and transportation, building, wood, energy, bio and biosourced materials, the environment, and in aviation and space applications. The further developments in this science continue on a daily basis and will contribute to even more innovative materials and technologies continuing to change the world for the better and to change the way we all live. We hope that this Special Issue will be representative of some of the cutting-edge, innovative research in polymer science and technology in France.
