Message from the Guest Editors

Dear Colleagues,

Plastic products have penetrated all areas of our daily life due to their versatile and tailorable properties. Meanwhile, the durability and improper end of life management of plastics and "white pollution" have gradually threatened both the natural environment and the human living environment. Reducing the hazards of discarded plastic products and exploring ways to recycle them which is attracting more and more attention from scientific researchers.

The aim of this Special Issue is to highlight progress in the degradation and recycling of polymers and composites, bio-based polymers, and biodegradable polymers.
