A Comparative Assessment of Migrant Integration in Asian Countries and Regions

Message from the Guest Editor

Northeast Asian countries and regions such as Japan, Korea, and Taiwan have accepted foreign migrant workers, marriage migrants, international students, and overseas compatriots for several decades. Despite the advantage of sharing blood and culture with their local compatriots, returning overseas compatriots also faced prejudice and discrimination in their homeland. In this way, immigrants from Northeast Asian countries and regions are unable to successfully integrate into their host countries and regions. In this Special Issue, we welcome papers that examine the level and issues of social integration of various migrant groups in Northeast Asian countries and regions from a comparative perspective. Papers that analyze factors affecting migrant integration (e.g. immigrant characteristics, immigration policies) are also welcome.
