Message from the Guest Editor

Dear Colleagues,

Psychological studies have indicated that, as humans, working together within our societal and organizational structures is essential to attaining a more sustainable environment. Therefore, it is crucial to apply the psychological process in sustainable development.

This collection is primarily focused on (but not limited to) the following areas. 1. Reviewing previous research on the adoption of climate change practices in the fields of sustainability and psychology. 2. Analyzing the impact of social and cultural factors on individual actions related to the environment and climate change. 3. Exploring the perspectives and experiences of non-WEIRD cultures and underrepresented populations to better understand the cultural influences on the environment, sustainability, and climate change. 4. Identifying policy recommendations and messaging that reflect cultural systems, thereby increasing the possibility of creating a united front in the fight against climate change.
