This Special Issue will study education issues related to economic development (such as education policy and finance, human capital production and acquisition, and the returns to human capital) and to sustainable future, i.e., how a system (a human society) operates and grows continuously, impacting environment, economy, industry, business, agriculture, etc., and influencing human future.

Authors from different disciplines, such as economics, education, social science, and other disciplines related to education for sustainable future and economic development are invited to submit their papers. Theoretical and empirical research articles are welcome for this Special Issue. For both theoretical and empirical studies, authors are highly expected to provide economic theoretical or empirical models and economic analyses.
