Our world is rapidly urbanized. More than half the world's population has been living in cities since 2007. Cities are powerhouses of economic growth. However, they contribute about 70 per cent of global carbon emissions and over 60 per cent of resource use. Such urbanization results in a growing number of inadequate and overburdened infrastructure and services, worsening air pollution and unplanned urban sprawl.

This Special Issue aims to publish high-quality manuscripts on the transdisciplinary research related to effects of public health system (such as transportation, air conditioning, waste collection, water and sanitation systems) improvement or malfunction on human health in cities and metropolitan areas.
