Message from the Guest Editors

This Special Issue aims to widen conversations and find empirical evidence on the economic consequences of climate change, especially in developing countries, to deepen our understanding of this topic. It also aims to present empirical research on the global subject and policy implications of climate change. Climate system variations are leading to financial and economic impacts that are already affecting the economy (Rising et al., 2022). While we know the climate will change, the local and regional implications for communities and economies are unknown (Kundo et al., 2022); policymakers disagree regarding the assumptions and actions taken to combat recent issues. Instead of making future-optimized selections, decision makers should make sound and robust decisions (Pörtner et al., 2022). This Special Issue aims to expand the scope of current debates; specifically, climate change is predicted to have significant implications on economic sustainability (Aglietta and Espagne, 2016; Batten et al., 2016; Scott et al., 2017; Monasterolo et al. 2019; Kotchen, M. J. 2020).
