Message from the Guest Editor

The COVID-19 pandemic we are currently experiencing globally has led to the introduction of unusual constraints on the economy and on society, with governments around the world taking extreme special measures and introducing unusual constraints on their population in an attempt to curb the disease's spread but also, at the same time, to protect the economy. This situation is completely unique and as such serves as an opening for a new, wide field of research. The main question behind this field is what kind of measures should be taken to ensure sustainable development for the economy but also for society. In this Special Issue, we address this question to economists, sociologists, sociophysicists, econophysicists, and other scientists who would like to present their points of view.
