This Special Issue brings together three fields of problemoriented research, all addressing the current challenges of our society from different perspectives and respective research traditions, namely: technology assessment (TA), responsible research and innovation sustainability research. Coming from different perspectives and research traditions, these approaches face similar challenges observing and shaping the current transitions of our society, which have been taken up in previous edited volumes. The SI intends to point out conceptual and methodological commonalities and differences of the three approaches, to comprise the integration of values into research, to address the issues of normativity in research activities, and to develop new methods in order to cope with the current challenges of our society, demanding constant rearrangements of science society relations.
