Message from the Guest Editor

Dear Colleagues,

This Special Issue aims to contribute to the sustainability literature by exploring the economic effects of sustainable tourism development. Sustainable tourism development is related to the environmental, economic, and sociocultural aspects, and a proper balance should be developed between these three dimensions to guarantee its long-term sustainability. Sustainability in tourism plays an important role for tourism planning and development. Tourism research has extensively analyzed tourism sustainability, but there is still a need to understand the economics aspects and consequences of sustainable tourism. Especially in the pandemic period, institutions, companies, regulatory bodies, and international organizations have now turned their gaze toward sustainability, which can emerge as a powerful tool from this highly uncertain period.
