Message from the Guest Editors

This Special Issue aims to bridge research on different kinds of population mobility by linking counter-urban migration to commuting and its role for reaching a social sustainability in everyday life. The scope of this Special Issue is to provide a platform for researchers to share their research work within the field of population mobility and social sustainability in daily life, including aspects of migration, commuting, and rural and/or urban development.

Among others, the following topics are encouraged:

- Post-pandemic migration and commuting patterns;
- Counter-urbanization population movement impacts on commuting patterns;
- Social sustainability for different groups of counter urban movers;
- Social sustainability in families' everyday life as a result of counter-urban migration;
- Relations between migration motives and possibilities for working from home;
- Interconnections between different life domains in counter-urban migration decisions;
- Commuting and its impacts on social sustainability in rural and urban areas.
