Message from the Collection Editors

Sustainable housing design today is encountering complex challenges with the requirement to improve not only the physical performance and affordability of the built environments but also humans' mental health and wellbeing. Housing is indeed a system of energy and environment, and it needs to accommodate societal and individual needs, desires, and expectations for healthy, comfortable, and affordable domestic living environments over the lifespan. To meet the dynamic diverse challenges, the global ZEMCH R&D movement has been launched. ZEMCH is an acronym meaning "Zero Energy Mass Custom Home" that reflects the social, economic, environmental, and human dimensions of the United Nations' Sustainable Development Goals.

This MDPI Sustainability Topical Collection Special Issue titled "ZEMCH International Research Series" aims to serve as a global depository of multidisciplinary technical knowledge required for ZEMCH delivery in developed and developing countries.
